Although it duplicates Mr. Jefferson's looks, manner and speech surprisingly well, it is too good aside from those resemblances to be set down as a mere imitation. The heart and soul of Rip are there, too.

There was no copyright law which prevented anybody from making and using a pay from Washington irvings tale of the latiskills. Nor was he, in view of the fact that he took his story almost bodily from the German, entitled to much sympathy in his lack of royalides. The first Rip van Winkie plees that Mr. Jefferson put on the stage was the actor's own work. After gaining considerable renown with it he had another version, the one now very familiar, written by Dion Boucleauit. The price is said to have been only $500. But the dramatization which Mr. McWade used was practically the same after all, as both transferred all there was in the living narrative and added a pot smilarly weak and futile. Ripsiany good humor, a flight from his irate wife an encounter with the spooks, a sleep of twenty years and a return to the village an aged stranger are the essentials. The reproduction at the American, aside from the fact of the production at the American, aside from the Sheldon, is generally good.

"What's that?" asked Mr. Moore. Do you mean to say "Now, Mr. Moore, proceed," asid Judge Newburger. Mr. Moore flushed but he went along for some time, reading questions from the former trial and the answers thereto, to which Mr. Weeks made almost uniformly the answer that he "didn't recoilect," whether he had made the statements quoted. In the midst of the reading of a long question Mr. Osborne jumped up.

"I object to the transposition of testimony. You are not reading that paragraph as it is written."

You are not reading that paragraph as it is written!"

"I am!" retorted Mr. Moore, with red face. His voice grew louder "I am reading the transcript word for word."

"You are not!" retorted Mr. Osborne heatedly.

Mr. Moore started around the long table in the general direction of Mr. Osborne and the spectators sat up in excitement.

"I'll leave it to the Court," said Mr. Moore as he walked, and he took the transcript to the Judge. Mr. Osborne rushed to the bench with his book. Judge Newburger took both. both.
